

seems both racial and post-racial,
bluff as political handshakes.
He will know its transparency, despite its hard edges, and see through it to a landscape beyond.

I should knock on his office door,
but what if his spirit answers with all that distance in his eyes?— nothing of the Promised Land but the endless desert beyond.

William Doreski has published three critical studies and several collections of poetry. His work has appeared in various journals. He has taught writing and literature at Emerson, Goddard, Boston University, and Keene State College. His new poetry collection is A Black River, A Dark Fall.

The Pangolin Review; Issue 9, March 8, 2019

